Many of today's high-tech devices (such as cell phones, hybrid cars, wind turbines, etc.) depend on minerals that contain rare earth elements (REEs): 17 elements in the periodic table including the 15 lanthanides plus yttrium and scandium). These elements aren't actually rare, but must be found in concentrated quantities that can be economically extracted. In addition, refining the mineral ores that contain REEs poses significant environmental challenges.

1. REE - Baotou, China. The region around Baotou, China currently provides more than 90% of the world's supply of REEs despite China having less than 40% of the world's proven reserves (reflecting, in part, regulation regarding environmental issues pertaining to the refining process). The Problem 1 placemark shows a large artificial lake created to hold the slurry of liquid and solid waste products from the refining process (including radioactive thorium and uranium). Use the Polygon tab on the Ruler tool to measure the area (acres) of the tailings pile and lake (i.e., trace the boundary highlighted by the Problem 1 placemark).
 - a. ~2000 acres
 - b. ~40 acres
 - c. ~640 acres
2. REE - Baotou, China. In general, groundwater in this region flows from the high mountainous region north of Baotou toward the south. Assume that you are a geologist for the REE mining company. What potential environmental concerns might you have for this region?
 - a. contamination of groundwater in the Guyang valley ~30 km N of the artificial lake
 - b. increased crop production due to irrigation with contaminated water enhancing soil nutrients
 - c. contamination of the Yellow River (S of city) affecting drinking water for upstream inhabitants
 - d. contamination of the groundwater that might affect local drinking water, especially S of the artificial lake and downstream along the Yellow River (S of city)
