Background

Spinal cord injury (SCI) is a serious condition that can result in permanent disability. The most common cause of SCI is trauma, such as a fall or a car accident. Other causes include degenerative diseases, infections, and tumors. SCI can affect any part of the spine, but the most common site of injury is the cervical spine (neck). The lumbar spine (lower back) is the second most common site of injury.

The lumbar spine is responsible for supporting the weight of the upper body and for allowing movement. It is composed of five vertebrae, each with a corresponding intervertebral disc. The discs are made of a soft, gelatinous material called nucleus pulposus, which is surrounded by a tough, fibrous ring called the annulus fibrosus. The discs act as shock absorbers, cushioning the vertebrae and allowing them to move relative to each other.

When a vertebra is injured, the disc can be damaged, leading to a herniation or a fracture. This can compress the spinal cord or the nerve roots, causing pain, numbness, and weakness. In severe cases, SCI can result in paralysis or loss of bowel and bladder control.

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a lumbar vertebra fracture on the biomechanical properties of the spine. We hypothesized that a fracture of the lumbar vertebra would lead to a decrease in the stiffness and strength of the spine, and an increase in the risk of further injury.
