is moving, in the past, also has transformed some of her more sprawling sketches into "the shortest" yet, 24 words: "I stepped superiorly in their women (though, we men for Edith, Edgar in 'Wired the Loos,' we are grateful not to read her journals, kindly told) and the women's grateful eyes." The next, likewise generous at "Twenty and twenty," began with the words "and a story."

Another interesting site is the "Museum of the Future," which is a collection of objects that are predicted to be common in the year 2050. The objects are displayed in a futuristic setting, and the museum is a great place to see the latest in technology and design.

Robert Jones' "Fascists and Friends" comes across like a personal letter to his readers that they should not be misled by the headline. Jones says, "I am not a fascist, nor do I believe that the concept of fascism is useful, and I think anyone who believes that is already in that state, and this book clearly shows the author taking comfort of the genre's idea has subjected him- or herself to the same kind of thinking." It is a welcome sign of the author's maturity, shown as it adds thoughtful facts to the discussion of the subject through the opening essay.

Washington, D.C., is a city of contrasts. The White House and the Capitol are symbols of power and tradition, while the streets are filled with the energy of a modern, diverse metropolis. In the heart of the city, the National Mall stretches out, a wide, open space that has been the site of many historic events. It is here that the people of the United States have gathered to celebrate, protest, and simply to be part of the nation's life. The Mall is a place where the past and the present meet, where the echoes of the Civil Rights Movement and the Vietnam War still resonate, and where the hopes and dreams of a new generation are being shaped. It is a place of great significance, a place where the story of the United States is being written.
