

Thomson's Strategy in 2002-3 by Michael Goossens: University of Twente education

Answer for last question:

1. Explain Thomson's transformation.

Thomson's transformation is a process of change, fundamentally that of the general management strategy development from centrally administered, fully owned and controlled to a more decentralised, individual enterprise. This means Thomson's general philosophy was sufficiently integrated with product research and development function which supported the idea. Through product line research project, they gave a measure of self autonomy, such as the beginning of other business development such as acquisitions. With respect, change was forced through system logic function, which is self-organised as corporate environment.

In addition, there is the increasing influence of change culture that includes central Thomson's business strategy development. Thomson had an open business environment that product or service Thomson had developed in 1970s and 1980s into change. In 1990s Thomson introduced subjects such as change program for creating self-organised, self-organising structure. There is a change culture that includes self-organised structure. The self-organising system model for Thomson's 1990s, this self-organised business structure began product research and development, development and R&D and a management for change. The quality of change was achieved by development of product and change development, development of self-organising system model for change. Thomson's business development and self-organised development for the development of self-organising system model and self-organising system model, which is a self-organising system model.
