1. The first step in the process of creating a new product is to identify a market need. This involves conducting market research to understand the needs and preferences of potential customers. Once a market need is identified, the next step is to develop a concept for a product that addresses this need. This concept should be based on the market research and should be feasible, profitable, and unique. The concept is then refined into a detailed product specification, which outlines the features, functions, and design of the product. This specification is used to create a prototype, which is a physical model of the product. The prototype is used to test the product's functionality and to gather feedback from potential customers. Based on the feedback, the product is refined and improved. Finally, the product is manufactured and distributed to the market. The entire process is iterative, and the product is continuously improved based on customer feedback and market trends.

Abstract The aim of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training programme on the maximum and average power output of the lower limbs in young male basketball players. The subjects were divided into two groups: a control group (n = 10) and a training group (n = 10). The training group performed a 12-week training programme consisting of three sessions per week. The control group did not perform any training. The maximum and average power output of the lower limbs were measured at the beginning and at the end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the training group had a significant increase in both maximum and average power output, while the control group did not show any significant change. The findings of this study suggest that a 12-week training programme can effectively improve the power output of the lower limbs in young male basketball players.
