

Finger Prints types and Characteristics

Fingerprints are formed from three basic shapes which are ridges, cores and deltas: -

Ridges: are the edged lines on your finger that forms the unique pattern for every fingerprint.

Cores: are the inner most recurve at the center of the pattern.

Deltas: are the features in a fingerprint where three areas of ridges converge into a triangle shape.

There are three main types of finger prints that we use to classify every finger print which are loops, arches and whorls: -

An arch pattern is the simplest type of fingerprints but also the rarest. Only about 5% of population have arch fingerprints, arch fingerprints have ridges begin in one side and ends on the other side making a line that looks like a hill, there are usually no cores or deltas in an arch

Loop patterns are the most common they are found in about 70% of the population, ridges in a loop pattern begin and end on the same side there are usually one core and one delta in a loop pattern.

In a whorl pattern the ridges form a spiral that appears to complete a full circle approximately 25% of the world population has whorl patterns there are usually two deltas in a whorl pattern.

As you look closer to a fingerprint you will notice that ridges start and stop as they flow through the pattern these are the characteristics of a fingerprint ridges.
