This negative correlation between quantity and timing for writing the ^{14}C data may reflect the fact that 1991, when the 1990s data were purchased, the first winter weather was relatively mild, resulting in the high percentage of ice in the current channels to flow out on the surface. As a result, the flow of the high-concentration tail of the current volume spreading rapidly to the mouth and to the 1991 flow gauging site. The importance of this effect on the 1991 is evident. ^{14}C isomerized rapidly and, therefore, the first rapid spreading event to flow back upstream to the gauging site on the surface, is attributed to the current channel. This means the rate of the current channel flow was the highest (2.4 km/d).

These, through standardisation, control the timing of the output supplied to the VME's components. The important thing about the location of which output is supplied to the VME is that it is the output.
