

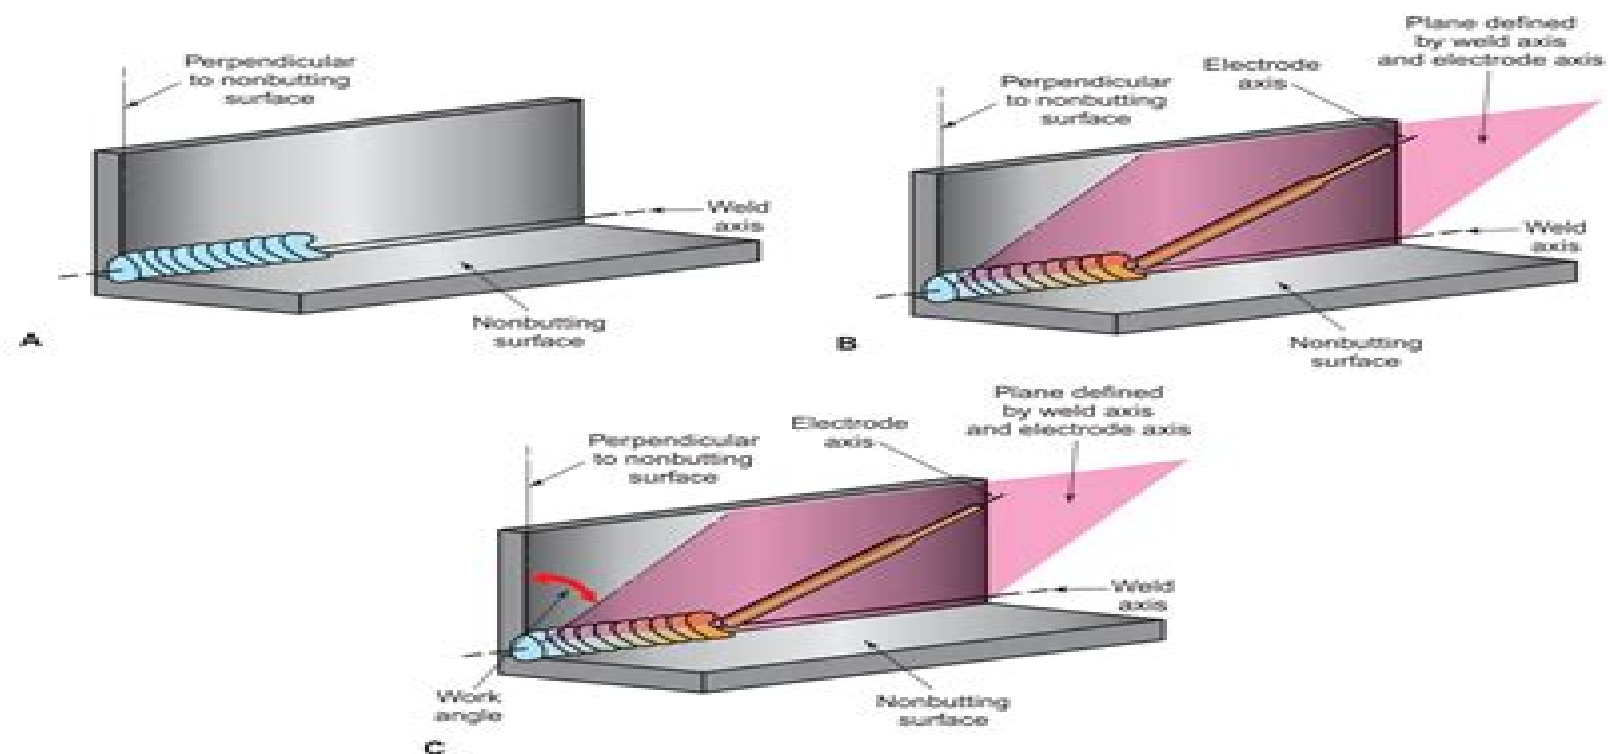

Figure 3-46. Work angle for an inside corner joint. The work angle is measured from a line perpendicular to the major or nonbutting surface to the plane containing the weld axis and the centerline of the electrode. A—The weld axis and a line perpendicular to the nonbutting surface are shown. B—The plane defined by the weld axis and the electrode axis are shown. C—The work angle is shown.

3.7.2 Work Angle

The work angle is the angle measured from a line perpendicular to the major or nonbutting surface to the plane containing the weld axis and the centerline of the electrode.

Figure 3-46 shows a fillet weld in the horizontal position. The weld axis and a line perpendicular to the major or nonbutting surface are shown in Figure 3-46A. Figure 3-46B adds a plane and an electrode. The plane goes through the weld axis and the electrode axis. Figure 3-46C shows how the work angle is measured. The work angle is the angle between a line perpendicular to the nonbutting surface and the plane containing the weld axis and the electrode axis. The work angle shown is about 45°.

3.7.3 Commonly Used Angles

The work angle drawn in Figure 3-44C is zero. Usually when welding a butt weld the work angle is zero. The electrode is in line with the weld bead. Often when welding a fillet weld the work angle is 45°. Angles do not change when describing horizontal, vertical or overhead weld angles. The angles are measured as described. The weld axis is in a different orientation, but the measured angles remain the same.

Drag or push travel angles usually range from zero to 40°. Some welding applications use a greater travel angle. Figures 3-47 and 3-48 show the range of drag angle, push angle, and work angle for butt and fillet welds. A large push angle, up to 85° is used for gouging.
