(b) Suggest two reasons for the distribution shown in Fig. 1.1. [6]

2 Assess the relative importance of weathering in the nutrient cycle of humid tropical (rainforest) ecosystems. [20]

3 'Geology is the most important factor influencing the formation of tropical karst landforms.' How far do you agree with this view? [20] coastal environments if answering this option, answer Question 4 and either Question 5 or Question 6.

4 Fig. 4.1 shows the movement of waves approaching an irregular coastline.

(a) Describe the pattern of wave approach shown in Fig. 4.1. [4]

(b) Explain the pattern of wave approach shown in Fig. 4.1 and how the pattern affects the distribution of wave energy. [6]

5 To what extent can the threats to coral reefs be successfully managed? [20]

6 Evaluate the role of sub-aerial processes in the formation of erosional landforms in coastal environments. [20]

1. The distribution of seasonally humid tropical (savanna) environments in Africa is shown in Fig. 1.1. The savanna is concentrated in the central and southern parts of Africa, particularly in the Congo Basin and the Great Rift Valley region. This distribution is influenced by factors such as climate, topography, and soil. The savanna is a transitional zone between the forest and the desert, and it is characterized by its unique vegetation and wildlife. The distribution of the savanna is a result of the interplay of these factors, and it is a key feature of the African landscape.

2. Weathering is a key process in the formation of tropical karst landforms. It is the process by which rocks are broken down into smaller particles, and it is a result of the action of water and air. Weathering is a complex process, and it is influenced by a number of factors, including the type of rock, the climate, and the topography. In humid tropical environments, weathering is particularly important, as it is the primary process by which the landscape is shaped. The weathering of rocks in these environments is a result of the high temperatures and high rainfall, which lead to the rapid breakdown of the rocks.

3. Geology is the most important factor influencing the formation of tropical karst landforms. This is because the type of rock that is present in an area determines whether or not karst landforms can form. Karst landforms are formed by the dissolution of soluble rocks, such as limestone, and they are a result of the action of water and air. In humid tropical environments, karst landforms are particularly common, and they are a key feature of the landscape. The formation of karst landforms is a result of the interplay of geology, climate, and topography, and it is a complex process that is still being studied by scientists.

4. The movement of waves approaching an irregular coastline is shown in Fig. 4.1. The diagram illustrates wave refraction, where wave fronts bend towards the headlands (points of land) and away from the bays. This is because the waves are moving faster in the deeper water and slower in the shallower water near the headlands. As a result, the wave fronts are forced to bend, and they eventually break on the shore. This process is a key feature of coastal erosion, and it is a result of the interplay of wave energy, coastal topography, and the shape of the coastline.

5. The threats to coral reefs can be managed to some extent, but it is a complex task that requires a combination of local and global efforts. Some of the threats to coral reefs include climate change, overfishing, and pollution. These threats are a result of human activities, and they are a major concern for scientists and conservationists. However, there are a number of ways in which these threats can be managed, and it is possible to protect coral reefs from further damage. This requires a combination of local and global efforts, and it is a task that requires the cooperation of many different groups and individuals.

6. Sub-aerial processes play a significant role in the formation of erosional landforms in coastal environments. These processes include wave erosion, wind erosion, and the action of the sun and wind on the land. These processes are a result of the natural forces that shape the landscape, and they are a key feature of coastal erosion. In coastal environments, these processes are particularly important, as they are the primary forces that shape the coastline. The formation of erosional landforms is a result of the interplay of these processes, and it is a complex process that is still being studied by scientists.
