In this part I didn't pay much attention to Family Groupwork. However, I did think for a moment "concurrent" therapy is a little used term for one type of therapy. In family therapy I saw ^{concurrent} family groupwork as a kind of support where family groupwork is doing other things where they are not connected to each other. I agree with the point that there are other things that family groupwork can do, but I think it is more about the ^{group} than the family itself. I agree with the point that there are other things that family groupwork can do, but I think it is more about the ^{group} than the family itself.
