

Mold Induced Asthma: Are Inhaled Mold Spores to Blame?

Wheezing, as you inhale and exhale trying to catch your breath. The difficult task of trying to regain your breath is an ongoing battle for those with asthma. Asthma is a growing health condition that plaques more and more people each year. Currently, 26 million people suffer from this condition, with 18.9 million adults and 7.1 million children affected. Asthma is a disease that affects your lungs and is one of the most common long-term diseases for children.

Researchers have been perplexed by the potential causes of the growing number of cases of asthma, especially in children. Some experts attribute growing asthma conditions on the rising level of pollution, with the production of pollen being a contributor to the 70 percent of people with asthma that also have allergies, according to the American Academy of Allergy, Asthma, and Immunology. Even the environment that kids are being raised in today can be another potential factor for asthma, as more home's are being built to be well-ventilated fortresses. Tight-ventilated home's, although economically sustainable, can also create a breeding ground for mold to grow. Can there be a potential link between the increase in asthma and exposure to mold?
