Abstract—Bronchopneumonia is an acute or chronic inflammation of the lungs, in which the alveoli and/or interstitial are affected. Usually the diagnosis of Bronchopneumonia is carried out using signs and symptoms of this disease, which cannot be measured since they consist of various types of uncertainty. Consequently, traditional disease diagnosis, which is performed by a physician, cannot deliver accurate results. Therefore, this paper presents the design, development and application of an expert system for assessing the suspicion of Bronchopneumonia under uncertainty. The Belief Rule-Based Inference Methodology using the Evidential Reasoning (RIMER) approach was adopted to develop this expert system, which is named the Belief Rule-Based Expert System (BRRES). The system can handle various types of uncertainty in knowledge representation and inference procedures. The knowledge base of this system was constructed by using real patient data and expert opinion. Practical case studies were used to validate the system. The system-generated results are more effective and reliable in terms of accuracy than from the results generated by a manual system.

I. INTRODUCTION

Bronchopneumonia is the acute inflammation of the walls of the bronchioles. It is a type of pneumonia characterized by multiple foci of isolated, acute consolidation, affecting one or more pulmonary lobules [1]. They take the fifth place in the statistics of diseases causing death. So, diagnosis of Bronchopneumonia is an important issue. Bronchopneumonia is a type of pneumonia. There are two types of pneumonia: lobar and bronchial. Lobar pneumonia affects one or more sections, or lobes, of the lungs. Bronchopneumonia affects both lungs and the bronchi. Bronchopneumonia can be mild or severe, with viral bronchopneumonia usually being less severe [2].

Medical diagnosis is a process to detect a disease by measuring its specific signs and symptoms in a patient. Signs are observed by a physician and symptoms are expressed by the patient. Accuracy in measuring process is very important factor. However, the accuracy of measurement may become doubtful at any phase of diagnosis. A patient may not be able to precisely express their feelings and doctors may not be certain about the condition of signs. Sometimes, incomplete data are in hand which jeopardize to reach a decision about a disease in a patient. These uncertainties should be carefully overcome in order to gain an accurate diagnosis result.

In the case of Bronchopneumonia there are some significant signs and symptoms that are observed during the diagnosis process. The most common signs and symptoms of Bronchopneumonia are chest in drawing, chest pain, fever, respiratory distress rate, crepitation, cough with phlegm, chest pain, chills, headache, and fatigue. These signs and symptoms cannot be measured with certainty during the diagnosis procedure since there exist various types of uncertainty such as vagueness in data, imprecision in linguistic terms, incompleteness of data, ignorance and randomness. Consequently, traditional disease diagnosis cannot provide error-free results and thus one cannot reach to a straightforward algorithmic solution to diagnose Bronchopneumonia accurately. Therefore, an expert system is needed to handle this type of problem.

Until now the research in this domain has been carried out using traditional rule-based expert systems for Bronchopneumonia diagnosis [3]. However, the uncertainty issues were not fully overcome due to the dependency on normal if-then rules. The lack of strength to handle uncertainty leads to a notable weakness in those rule based expert systems.

This paper presents the development of an expert system (ES), based on a methodology, known as the belief rule-base (BRB) inference methodology using the evidential reasoning (RIMER) [4][5][6].
