While these seemingly comprehensive factors are hardly solutions, Mawer's self-administered questionnaire focuses on identifying specific life conditions: stress, structure stress and power relationships. It asks: "For employees, related conditions are: (a) stress (b) structure (c) power (d) relationships (e) management and relations (f) others." For each of six items are the 2000 employees asked their perceptions and given single-point responses, reflecting whether, generally, management is fair, good, better, worse, or very bad. The results are displayed in Table 1. The highest percent of "very bad" ratings are displayed in Table 2. The highest percent of "very bad" ratings are displayed in Table 3. The highest percent of "very bad" ratings are displayed in Table 4.

According to several sources, the estimated figure for an individual with an American good average IQ is $200,000, further estimated without any inflation at about $100,000.
