

When the switch is closed, the circuit is complete and the light bulb will glow.

The circuit is a series circuit, meaning that the current flows through each component in sequence. In this case, the current flows from the positive terminal of the battery, through the switch, and then through the light bulb before returning to the negative terminal of the battery.

The light bulb glows because the electric current causes the filament inside the bulb to heat up and emit light.

This simple circuit demonstrates the basic principles of electricity and how it can be used to power a device. It is a fundamental concept in physics and engineering.

In this parallel circuit, the current from the battery splits into two paths, one for each light bulb. This means that each bulb receives the full voltage from the battery and can operate independently of the other.

Parallel circuits are commonly used in household wiring because they allow multiple devices to be powered simultaneously without affecting each other's operation. For example, a lamp and a television can both be plugged into the same outlet and work independently.

The diagram illustrates how the arrangement of components in a circuit affects the flow of current and the operation of the devices. Understanding these principles is essential for designing and troubleshooting electrical systems.

This diagram shows a parallel circuit with a battery, a switch, and two light bulbs. The current flows from the battery, through the switch, and then splits to flow through both light bulbs simultaneously. This setup ensures that both bulbs receive the full voltage and can operate independently.
