

Savage et al (2001) presented an approach to the traceback problem that addresses the needs of both victims and network operators. The possibility of tracing flooding attacks by "marking" packets, either probabilistically or deterministically, with the addresses of the routers they traverse. The victim uses the information in the marked packets to trace an attack back to its source. A router "marks" one or more packets by augmenting them with additional information about the path they are travelling. The victim attempts to reconstruct the at-tack path using only the information in the marked packets. It allows a victim to identify the network path(s) traversed by attack traffic without requiring interactive operational support from Internet Service Providers (ISPs).

Belenky et al (2003) proposed a Deterministic Packet Marking (DPM), a new approach to IP traceback. The 16-bit Packet ID Field and 1-bit Reserved Flag (RF) in the IP header will be used to mark packets. The packet is marked by the interface closest to the source of the packet. A general principle in handling DDoS attacks is to rely only on the information transferred in the DPM mark. The DPM Mark can be used to not only transfer the bits of the ingress address but also some other information. This additional information should enable the destination to determine which ingress address segments be-long to which ingress address. At the victim, a table matching the source addresses to the ingress addresses is maintained. The reconstruction procedure utilizes the data structure called Reconstruction Table (RecTbl), in which the destination would first put the address segments. After segments corresponding to the same ingress address have arrived to the destination, the ingress address for a given source address becomes avail-able to the victim.

Xiang et al (2009) presented a Flexible Deterministic Packet Marking (FDPM) which provides a defense system with the ability to find out the real sources of attacking packets that traverse through the network. The FDPM scheme utilizes various bits (called marks) in the IP header. The mark has flexible lengths depending on the network protocols used, which is called flexible mark length strategy. The flexibility of FDPM is twofold. First, it can use flexible mark length according to the network protocols that are used in the network. This characteristic of FDPM gives it much adaptability to current heterogeneous networks. Second, FDPM can adaptively adjust its marking process to obtain a flexible marking rate. This characteristic prevents a traceback router from the overload problems. It has been used to not only trace DDoS attacking packets but also enhance filtering attacking traffic.
