

to assume Normality, you must check two conditions:

Ten-Percent Condition: The population is greater than $10n$. The sample size must be no larger than 10% of the population.

Normal Condition: $np \geq 10$ and $n(1 - p) \geq 10$, where n is the sample size and p is the population proportion. This tells you that the sample size is "big enough."

When these conditions are met, you know the mean of a sample proportion, μ_p , will have a mean equal to the true population proportion, p . You also know the sample proportion is the number of successes divided by the number of trials, n , so the standard deviation should also be divided by n .

$$\mu_p = p$$
$$\sigma_p = \sqrt{\frac{p(1-p)}{n}}$$

Understanding the Formula

- μ_p is the mean of the sample proportion.
- p is the population proportion.
- σ_p is the standard deviation of the sample proportion.
- n is the number of trials.

The amount of variation of a measure in a sample, from a population or subpopulation, depends both on the amount of variation in the population or subpopulation and on the size of the sample.

When working with sample proportions, a Normal sampling distribution is sought. A Normal sampling distribution allows you to find probabilities and to answer questions. It's the same story with sample means.

μ represents the mean of a sample whereas μ represents the mean of the entire population. Because both represent a mean, it is important to use the symbol correctly for the statistic or parameter you are studying.

If a population distribution is Normal, then any sample size, n , can be used for the sampling distribution.

The Central Limit Theorem (CLT) says that the sampling distribution of any mean becomes more Normal as the sample size increases, regardless of the population distribution.

However, to use the CLT you must check two conditions:

1. Independence: The sample values must be independent of one another.
2. Sample size: The sample size, n , must be sufficiently large ($n \geq 30$).

When you check the conditions for Normality and know
