In the laboratory, biofilms are often grown on plastic substrates in the aqueous phase, but in the natural world, biofilms are found on a wide variety of surfaces, including rocks, plants, and animals. The formation of biofilms is a complex process that involves the attachment of bacteria to a surface, the production of extracellular polymeric substances (EPS), and the development of a structured community. The study of biofilms is important for understanding the role of bacteria in disease and for developing strategies to prevent and treat infections.
