Evolution of Amphibians [Synthesis Paper]

Summary:

Amphibians have been labeled in their feeding movements comparative to other vertebrates, based on the studies of a few model taxa. Nevertheless, the recent studies of a variety of amphibians showed diversity in their feeding mechanics and kinematics and exemplify that stereotypy is the exception rather than the rule in amphibian feeding habits. The lissamphibians which were the common ancestor of today's amphibians was most likely capable of some modulation of feeding movements, and that their descendants have evolved along two trajectories with regard to motor control. The first is that an increase in modulation via feedback or feed-forward mechanisms, as illustrated by ballistic-tongued plethodontid salamanders and hydrostatic-tongued frogs. The second is a decrease in variation dictated by biomechanics that require tight coordination between different body parts, such as the tongue and jaws in toads and other frogs with ballistic tongue projection. Multi-joint coordination of rapid movements may hamper accurate tongue placement in ballistic-tongued frogs as compared to both short-tongued frogs and ballistic-tongued-salamanders that face simpler motor control tasks. Decoupling of tongue and jaw movements is associated with increased accuracy in both hydrostatic-tongued frogs and ballistic-tongued salamanders.

The transition of vertebrates from aquatic to land habitat was associated with their evolution on physiology and anatomy, respectively. One of the evolutions due to adaptation is how the aortic arches change during the transition of amphibians. The transition of their adaptations is fast due to their physiological needs. It is supposed that the branching of aortic arches of water-dwelling piscine ancestors, of intermediate form which is left the water and of primitive tetrapods while the arch V was still complete and not interrupted.

The conservation of each phylogenetic taxa will be great in diversity which allows maximizing evolutionary information preserved within fauna and flora. The "EDGE of Existence" program is the first institutional conservation initiative that prioritizes species based
