

Step Four – Stop and check

Now is the time to write a short proposal about your research project. You should write about 100–150 words explaining your topic area, your question, what you wish to investigate and what the studies you have found can add to your discussion.

This serves a few purposes. First, it allows you to organise your thoughts properly and give you a solid focus. It also allows your adviser to check that you are progressing properly and have not decided upon a topic or question in which it will be too difficult to obtain a good grade. Finally, it also gives you some starting information on which to base your final reflection.

Step Five – Reading

You will need to read a lot to be able to produce a good quality essay. To save yourself from wasting time reading irrelevant material, you should begin by reading the abstract at the end of the study. If this suggests that you will find the study useful, go to the end of the study and read the conclusion. This should help give you a basic idea of whether the study will be helpful to your argument. If so, you can then begin reading it in more depth.

Many studies are very technical and contain information that you will not need. The key is to be able read through a study quickly and pull out the information you require. This comes with practice; the more you read, the more efficient you will become at finding the information you need efficiently. Most studies are laid out with an introduction first which gives a background to the topic area. They then move on to explain what the researchers wanted to test. The method section then explains what the researchers did followed by the results section which describes what they found. The discussion section then applies the study to the theory and explains what the results mean. Finally, there is a conclusion to summarise what the researchers found.

Step Six – Finding more research

Each study you find that is relevant can be very helpful in helping you find more research. It is highly recommended that you read the introductions of the studies you choose. This is because they give more information about the theory and topic you are writing about so can provide you with more ideas and things to consider.

The introduction will also reference other studies that have been conducted into this topic area. The research in the introduction will likely be very useful for your essay. You can find the research listed in the reference section at the end of the study. If a study mentioned in the introduction seems like it might be useful, you can go and search for that particular study, which will have its own introduction and list of studies. You can now quickly gather a lot of relevant studies and research in this way.

As a general rule, you should aim for 10 or more original studies to include in your essay. The more up-to-date those studies are, the better.

Do not be restrictive in your essay. Allow yourself to change its content and direction as you read more and discover more about your topic area. You will very likely find things that you have not yet thought of and would like to add. You should search for a study that can give evidence, support or more information about something you are writing about that will lead to more ideas.
