

Chapter One

Introduction To Criminology

1-What is criminology?

Why do people get paid to study crime and criminal behavior , and why do people engage in this area of study ?

There are a variety of answers of these questions, built around many kinds of concerns , like the anxiety, anger , and fear that are common responses to crime of the future crimes . Former victims of crimes may contribute of showing the importance of studying criminology by, transferring them experience and feeling of anxiety, anger, and fear which Generated from crimes to other persons .

Then the need to study criminology become at the forefront of priorities , to predict and control crime; the hope of preventing crime through individual and social reform the wish to understand and explain crime and societal reactions to it; and the simple desire to learn more about crime and what it can tell us about our society .

What's exactly criminology deal with? This is not an easy question to answer for a number of reasons.

First, as already noted, criminology involves a wide-ranging number of different viewpoints, and their proponents will often have enduring disagreements about exactly what the task of criminology is.

Is it to explain why individuals choose to commit offences?

Is it to understand the social conditions out of which crime problems emerge?

Is it to examine what different societies at different times understand by the term 'crime' itself?
