Introduction

Psychological tests are techniques or processes that are used in assessing as well as evaluating information one gives to whoever is examining him or her. This marks the origination of its name, which is psychological evaluation (Kaplan, 2005). Whoever is being evaluated gives correspondence in form of solutions verbal or written. The accuracy of a psychological test will depend mostly on answers or questions.

Types of psychological tests

- Achievement and Aptitude Tests

Is commonly practiced in educational as well as employment set ups, since they tend to measure the scope of understanding of a given knowledge. Most educational institutions incorporate this kind of test within its system. For instance during the new enrollment in schools; where new students are interviewed on their competence and possession of the set standard of that particular institution.

Achievement and aptitude tests are usually observed in the educational or service background. This kind of tests, therefore try to gauge either on how much an individual is acquainted with about a definite subject (Kline, 2005). This test therefore, entails that an individual requires to be tested on what achievements in terms of knowledge one has maybe in mathematics or spelling. Also on how much of ability an individual has this is an individuals' ability in mastering a matter in an exact region, such as mechanical associations.

- Intelligence Test

Measures ones intelligence ability of an individual, which a better knowledge of the general world surrounding him or her. Intelligence tend to measure ones potential and not what has been acquired or learned as its in the achievement test, this make it call for it being autonomous from culture. While designing this tests it becomes hard to make it be free fro culture-this is its weakness (Kaplan, 2005).
