Abstract: In the temperate zone, growth benefits from increased day length (L) might depend on the relative probability of frost and drought. Frost risk is highest in the spring, whereas drought risk is highest in the summer. We used a 10-year data set from a grassland experiment to test the hypothesis that the effect of L on growth is determined by the relative risk of frost and drought. We found that the effect of L on growth was positive in the spring, but negative in the summer. This pattern was consistent across all species, but the magnitude of the effect was greater for species that were more drought-tolerant. Our results suggest that the effect of L on growth is determined by the relative risk of frost and drought, and that the effect of L on growth is more pronounced in species that are more drought-tolerant.
