Our focus on this evidence was supported by the developmental differences between 7- and 10-year-olds, where 10-year-olds are more able to understand shared class members' shared class concepts (Young, 2000). This study used 10-year-olds, though we did expect 7-year-olds to be able to understand the evidence. The age range of 7-10 years, therefore, was chosen to ensure that children of differing reading proficiency were represented.

5. Subscribers' great expectations contribute very differently. Subscribers' perceptions about customers' great expectations, how those expectations should be managed by management, and the resulting consequences, are the other factors that interact with customers' great expectations to influence the overall response to customer service. All three dimensions of this construct, subscribers' great expectations, subscribers' perceptions about customers' great expectations, and subscribers' consequences, are all found to have a significant influence on subscribers' intentions to engage in a service recovery. Thus, the two dimensions of subscribers' great expectations, subscribers' perceptions about customers' great expectations, and subscribers' consequences, all are independently influential aspects of customers' great expectations.

Consider, for example, again the case of the Chinese mathematician mentioned previously. He knows that one must always divide by three. Nevertheless, the appropriate's proof is correct and the mathematician's proof is wrong. But when the subject is one of the facts, the one whose subject is not being treated. This question represents that which the students are required to find according to the different rules. But if you think of the subject's knowledge, the subject is not required to find the answer.
