

How Gold Fever Started

Exploitation is a story as old as time – but one that we are working collaboratively to end at Gold Fever. In an industry as vibrant as hair extensions there are choices in terms of the way that businesses opt to move forward – taking the route of exploitation or making constructive choices that have positive motives at heart. If you've never thought much about how sourcing for hair extensions is handled then this blog is for you. We share all the information you need to make a positive and informed choice about how to ensure you're buying ethically.

Where did it start for us?

Thomas Gold and Mayoora Balsara are the founders and creators of Gold Fever. We are committed to an ethically-driven approach and choose to focus on honouring women, cultural values and delivering quality in a world where these pillars are so often compromised for profit. We work with local communities to source the hair for our hair extensions, providing opportunities for people in regions of India and creating relationships based on trust and respect. So, how does it work?

Hair extensions is a fast-expanding industry

In fact, it has ballooned over the past decade as more and more people have been interested in buying these products for themselves. In the capitalist-driven world that we all live in this has, inevitably, meant that many businesses have begun to look for opportunities to drive up profit. Cheaper sourcing often seems like the answer to this – the cheaper the hair that is used in hair extensions, the larger the profit margin will be. At Gold Fever we feel this bypasses the positive impact that fair pricing and treatment has on the communities from which the hair is sourced. But there are so many companies out there that don't think like us.
