Broadus,2013 Nationwide close to 40 million adults lack a high school diploma or a General Educational Development GED credential Nearly a quarter of high school freshmen do not graduate and in many large cities dropout rates in recent years have stood at around 50 percent And while most high school dropouts eventually do continue their education usually through adult education or GED preparation programs too few of those who start GED programs ever pass the exam Moreover for those who do earn their GED the certificate often marks the end of their education in part because few GED programs even those that operate on community college campuses are well linked to college or training programs Students with only a high school diploma already face long odds of success in a labor market that increasingly prizes specialized training and college education for GED holders the chances are even worse Given this context the need to develop stronger pathways to college for those without high school credentials is clear And this need is only magnified by new rules eliminating federal financial aid for aspiring college students without a high school diploma or a GED and by the planned 2014 implementation of a new GED exam that emphasizes college readiness To better understand how adult education programs might strengthen pathways to college and careers MDRC with financial support from the Robin Hood Foundation and MetLife Foundation partnered with LaGuardia Community College of the City University of New York CUNY to launch a small but rigorous study of the GED Bridge to Health and Business program The GED Bridge program represents a promising new approach to GED instruction as it aims to better prepare students not only to pass the GED exam but also to continue on to college and training programs MDRC has conducted several evaluations of programs that include GED preparation as one among many program components but this evaluation is one of only a few to focus specifically on GED curriculum program design and efforts to forge a stronger link to college and career training The results are highly encouraging One year after enrolling in the program Bridge students were far more likely to have completed the course passed the GED exam and enrolled in college than students in a more traditional GED preparation course This brief details some of the key findings from this study as well as their implications for future research and for the development of stronger GED and adult education programming
