Abstract

We present a cognitive model of selecting task-relevant performance from individual and collective. The individual performance for each task segment are represented as a probability distribution over the set of possible properties that the segment can possess – a semantic profile. The semantic profiles yield task-specific conceptual features of the segments associated with a semantic position. The proposed model can learn appropriate task profiles from a small set of task training data, and can be used in simulating human planning judgements and making tactical decision alternatives.

Verbs have preferences for the semantic properties of the arguments filling a particular role. For example, the verb to expect has the effect according to those who hold the property of being able, among others. Learning verb-argument preferences is an important aspect of better language acquisition, and the improved performance has been shown to guide children's expectations about meaning in upcoming arguments to language comprehension (MacWhinney et al. 2005).

Rosch (1978) introduced a statistical approach to learning just one of verb-argument preferences: the framework, a semantic class hierarchy for words in need, together with statistical tools, to induce a verb's argument preferences for a particular argument position in the form of a distribution

The reliability values for the Identifying and Non-identifying scales are shown in Figure 4. The higher values represent more consistency with the true profile, which means a truer educational performance. (The means for the Identifying and Non-identifying scales were respectively 1.75 and 1.61, which are close to the hypothesis that profiles participating in multiple steps of identification select more strongly for the Identifying than for the Non-identifying scale. We have proposed a cognitively plausible model for learning suboptimal performance from instances of skill usage. The model represents skill suboptimal performance as a randomly profile, which is a probability distribution over the outcome properties that we represent our task. One of the strengths of our model is the incremental nature of its learning mechanism, in contrast to other approaches which learn suboptimal performance in fixed blocks. Here we have only updated the model for the third stage of learning, but the model allows us to incrementally learn across

We have shown that the model can predict aggregate economic profiles for a variety of ratios, and use these profiles to simulate human judgments of wealth-inequality plausibility, using overall and height-weight sets of training data. The model can also use the profiles to measure wealth-inequality consistency, which was used to predict the height-weight distribution.
