Abstract Background: Despite the known gender inequality in many countries, there is limited research on understanding a gender gap in health care. Methods: gender is analyzed in relation to the health inequalities through education. The relationship between education and health inequalities is studied across five groups in the education system. The regression analysis is conducted separately for the population and education group. Results: The results show that the gender gap is not significant in the health inequalities across the education groups. Conclusion: The findings indicate that the gender gap is not related to education, which may be due to the gender inequality in the health care system.
