The most important outcome of the various forms of bonding and folding is that each different type of protein develops a unique shape, and its surface displays a distinctive pattern of peaks and ridges. As a result, a protein (as well) only will interact with complement or fit its particular surface features like a lock and key. Such a degree of specificity can provide the functional diversity required for many thousands of different cellular activities. Enzymes serve as the catalysts for all chemical reactions in cells, and nearly every reaction requires a different enzyme (see chapter 7). This specificity comes from the architecture of the binding site, which determines which molecules fit it. The same is true of antibodies. Antibodies are complex glycoproteins with specific regions of attachment for bacteria, viruses, and other microorganisms; certain bacterial toxins (poisonous products) react with only one specific region of tissue and proteins embedded in the cell membrane have receptors sites restricted to a certain nutrient. The functional three-dimensional form of a protein is termed the native state, and if it is disrupted by some means, the protein is said to be denatured, such agents as heat, acid, alcohol, and some disinfectants disrupt (and thus denature) the making bonds within the chains and cause the molecule to become nonfunctional, as described in chapter 9.

The Nucleic Acids: A Cell Computer and Its Programs

DNA, the master blueprint of cells, contains a special coded genetic program with detailed and specific instructions for each organism's heredity. It translates the details of its program to RNA, "helper" molecules responsible for carrying out DNA's instructions and translating the DNA program into proteins that run proteins life systems. For now, let us briefly consider the structure and some functions of DNA, RNA, and a close relative, ribonucleic acid (RNA).
