

Essay Example on 7000 Languages Spoken Worldwide: Exploring the Evolution of Language Essay

Question 1

Languages play an instrumental role in the communication of communities as well as the preservation of the culture and traditions of the people. Words are believed to be in the process of evolution as human beings evolve, which is an instrumental aspect of any community that uniquely identifies them as unique (Heggarty, 2007). Today, about 7000 languages in total are spoken in the world today with the words belonging to different language families and estimated to have started thousands of years ago (Belew & Simpson, 2018). Before languages, humans used sounds and gestures that were primitive in nature as a means of communication (Heggarty, 2007). Therefore, some languages spoken today are older than others, which depend on the oldest record of the word ever discovered. However, some languages which were not recorded earlier than others can be disadvantaged by this method used to date languages.

The ages of languages are determined by the time they appeared in written text and the use of the word in the present (Heggarty, 2007). The cuneiform script represents the earliest language on record ever discovered in the world, and it was found in Mesopotamia and believed to have been recorded in the 8th millennium BC. The age of languages is determined by different methods that range from the dating of the earliest forms of communications ever documented and also the use of scientific methods such as estimating the anatomical and genetic features evolution associated with language or speech production (Heggarty, 2007).

Different modern languages have been developed in alignment with the growing technology which has been instrumental in the dating of different styles. Apart from using the earliest records of a word to date the languages and establish the age of writing the use of the phonemic diversity and cognates can be used to compare and date the age of different styles (Perreault & Mathew, 2012). The use of phonemic diversity and cognates helps to resolve the existing challenge in language dating which is marred with uncertainty due to the use of genetic dating with the discovery that even Neanderthals possessed speech genes in humans today which makes the gene dating approach inefficient in dating languages (Perreault & Mathew, 2012). Besides, the phonemic diversity is a better dating method because it can be used to measure the age of different languages which is limited in the case of genetic and earliest record method (Perreault & Mathew, 2012). In some cases, recording of words depended on the availability of writing technology and not basically on the age of the word, which makes the method flawed with opportunities for errors.

The phonemic diversity method of dating languages depends on the units of sound consonants tones and vowels in a style which varies from one language to another depending on the time that the word has been evolving (Perreault & Mathew, 2012). The phonemic diversity also proves as an excellent method of dating languages because it is statistically supported by containing different statistical signal. The phonemic diversity varies from one style to another, and also phonemic diversity varies depending on the population size that communicates a specific language (Perreault
