*The percentage of attention is calculated as number of words in topic sentence divided by total number of words in topic sentence. When a word is shared between two sentences, it is counted twice, once for each sentence. For example, the sentence "The cat sat on the mat" would be counted as 10 words, even though it only has 9 words.

These symptoms are also present in some other diseases and conditions, including the following. Depending on the severity and frequency of the symptoms, some other diseases might also need to be ruled out, such as:

- Depression and anxiety disorders: Feeling better emotionally after treatment with antidepressants and/or anxiolytics can indicate that the symptoms are related to these conditions.
- Substance use disorders: Some drugs, such as alcohol, can cause symptoms similar to those of depression and anxiety.
- Medical conditions: Some medical conditions, such as thyroid disease, can cause symptoms similar to those of depression and anxiety.

It is important to consult a healthcare professional if you experience any of these symptoms, as they may be a sign of a serious condition. A healthcare professional can help you determine the cause of your symptoms and recommend appropriate treatment.

*These results represent the average for respondents in all three of the sub-samples, with findings for each region reported separately. Studies of this kind have to be interpreted with care. They are preliminary and inevitably reflect gaps in respondents' knowledge. However, the findings are striking and suggest that the respondents' attitudes will be a good representation of the views of the whole. Indeed, the respondents are a representative sample of the population, as determined by the telephone survey. Finally, the respondents are a better educated group than the national average, and this may influence the findings.
