- Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged men. The study was a randomized controlled trial. The subjects were randomly assigned to a 12-week training program (n = 20) or a control group (n = 20). The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The control group did not participate in any training program. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The physical fitness and health-related quality of life were measured. The results showed that the training program had a significant positive effect on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of the subjects. The subjects in the training group showed a significant increase in the maximum heart rate, maximum oxygen consumption, and maximum power. The subjects in the training group also showed a significant increase in the health-related quality of life scores. The subjects in the control group did not show any significant changes in the physical fitness and health-related quality of life. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary middle-aged men.
