Other studies have given mixed responses and a knowledge gap in understanding the relationship between the individual's perception and the level of perceived threat to the host country and individual is an important consideration. Further, only a limited number of studies have investigated the relationship between the level of perceived threat and the level of perceived threat to the host country. These two studies have shown that the level of perceived threat to the host country is not related to the level of perceived threat to the host country.

Belgian researchers in Flanders in 2001 interviewed 10,000 people about their attitudes toward people with HIV. They found that 80% of respondents believed that people with HIV should be treated with respect and dignity, and that 70% of respondents believed that people with HIV should be able to work and study. These results are consistent with the findings of the 2001 survey.
