Place the information below in boxes that correspond to the boxes (a-f).

- a. Linnaean taxonomy is hierarchical, includes a series of increasingly specific steps, or categories, composed of hierarchical prefixes (kingdom, phylum, class, order, family, genus, species) ending with taxon names. (Linnaeus invented binomial nomenclature.)
- b. The domain is the most general taxon, subdividing the greatest number of species. The next category is phylum, and then class, order, and family. The species is the most specific name and refers to a group of similar organisms that can interbreed and produce fertile offspring.
- c. The genus includes all those and includes species having other names, usually based on sexual traits. All of the traits shared among members of a genus are inherited from a common ancestor. Each species is defined only in different ways, and their physical traits are slightly different from one another.
- d. A kingdom includes several phyla; eukaryotes are eukaryotes and prokaryotes are prokaryotes. For example, the animal kingdom includes a multitude of phyla, insects, and vertebrates, while the monera are members of the eukaryotes and are members of the animal kingdom.
- e. Linnaeus's knowledge was limited; he realized that a single kingdom did not sufficiently categorize the differences among prokaryotes, two kingdoms and more kingdoms (Eubacteria and Eukaryotes). Eventually, scientists subdivided the difference between the kingdoms into great enough regions themselves into three, prokaryotes.
- f. The three domains are defined by characteristics that many differences at the cellular level between the bacteria, eukaryotes, and prokaryotes. The scientists agreed that based on these shared common very simple properties of life on Earth.
