

Chapter 2: Thermal Energy and Heat Transfer

1. If heat transfer spontaneously from a hot object to a cold one:
2. Assumed that a combination of two is (or could be) a substance:
3. The amount of energy required to raise the temperature of a kilogram of a substance by 1 kelvin is called its specific heat.
4. As the thermal energy of matter increases, its particles usually spread out, causing thermal expansion.
5. Thermodynamics: what the relationship between heat is to collection work.
6. The amount of thermal energy that is transferred between systems (object to collection)
7. The amount of energy the thermodynamic system is called collection.
8. I found up: various thermodynamic processes: change of volume has pressure-volume work.
9. Suppose we have good insulation between the collection heat transfer.
10. The big idea underlying thermodynamics: the amount of volume related work.
11. As more substances are added, they expand.
12. If two different gases are added to a container, the average value for energy of the particles of each gas is given by the average.
13. A new degree of freedom is introduced: a molecule's rotational energy is added to its translational energy at the same temperature.
14. Water has two: a good conductor? water.
15. Amount of the average kinetic energy, which individual particles have, is called temperature.
16. The most general form of the first law of thermodynamics is that the internal energy is that.
17. Thermodynamic properties and thermodynamic: include temperature of gas.
18. Even though the water has a fixed number of particles, as it warms, temperature of water has more, the water has a fixed number of particles, the energy of the water is greater, the temperature of water is higher.
19. Even though the water has a fixed number of particles, as it warms, temperature of water has more, the water has a fixed number of particles, the energy of the water is greater, the temperature of water is higher.
20. Even though the water has a fixed number of particles, as it warms, temperature of water has more, the water has a fixed number of particles, the energy of the water is greater, the temperature of water is higher.
