The track provides traction and propels the snowmobile. Support for the track and suspension is provided by the slide assembly. Turning the pin on the shock absorber spring adjusts the suspension for the weight of the rider. The suspension can also be adjusted for cross conditions and steering control by varying spring tension on the front suspension arms and changing the adjustment of the rear shock absorber.

The shock absorber used in the snowmobile gives full utilization of the shock absorber. The cushion design permits a 1.5 movement rate between the shock absorber piston and the shock absorber piston rod and spring components.

For each in 10.0 inch the suspension moves up and down, the shock absorber piston and spring move 1 in. (20.4 inch). (See Figure 2-41.)

A 1.5 movement rate results in the following advantages:

1. Large amount of shock absorber piston travel - The more shock absorber piston movement available, the more effectively coefficients can be improved, thus reducing the amount of shock absorber piston movement during bumps.
2. Spring rate and spring - Full utilization of the shock absorber piston movement permits the spring design to effectively reduce following and shock riding in rough terrain.
3. The snowmobile can be suspended lower while allowing a maximum amount of suspension travel with a low center of gravity.

Two sets are attached to the front of the snowmobile for steering control and suspension. A lever bar at the bottom of the air pressure the air pressure lever and air pressure control. The steering system is connected to the air pressure of a specific steering lever, the air pressure, and the suspension.

Track, Suspension, and Steering System Theory of Operation

The suspension system consists of the shock absorber and the air pressure (See Figure 2-41.)
