Abstract. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of a 1000-m swim time trial. The subjects were 10 male triathletes who were divided into two groups: a control group and a training group. The training group performed a 12-week training program consisting of swimming, cycling, and running. The control group did not perform any training. The results showed that the training group had a significantly lower swim time than the control group ($p < 0.05$). The training group also had a significantly lower heart rate and oxygen consumption during the swim time trial. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can improve swim performance in triathletes.
