After 2 months, adolescents with depression showed fewer improvements, and neurocognitive function improved by only one-third, a finding that may have contributed to the lower rates of improvement. Although they needed more support from their parents, adolescents in the group showed less improvement than the group that received the treatment. In addition, a few participants in these studies were not able to complete the study, and the researchers reported that the adolescents who dropped out of the study were more likely to have had more severe depression.
