Diabetic neuropathies : clinical sub-types, early detection and asking help from the specialist

In diabetes mellitus, it is expected to see a common, mostly sensitive, distal symmetrical polyneuropathy (DPN) involving a large proportion of diabetic patients according to known risk factors. Several other diabetic peripheral neuropathies are recognized, such as dysautonomia and multifocal neuropathies including lumbosacral radiculoplexus and oculomotor plexus. In this review, general aspects of diabetic neuropathies are examined, and it is discussed why and how the general practitioner has to perform a proper examination. At the present time, some consensus emerge to ask help from the specialist when faced to other forms of peripheral neuropathies than distal symmetrical DPN.

Dans le diabète, il est attendu, en fonction de facteurs favorisants connus, l'apparition d'une polyneuropathie (PNP) symétrique à prédominance de signes sensitifs. Or, des neuropathies variées sont décrites telles que la dysautonomie et des neuropathies multifocales (amyotrophie diabétique proximale et neuropathies crâniennes). Cet article permet de rediscuter les limites des tableaux cliniques connus, et de décrire pourquoi et comment le médecin traitant devrait pratiquer un examen clinique annuel de dépistage. Le consensus actuel est de s'adresser au spécialiste que les neuropathies différentes de la PNP symétrique attendue.

INTRODUCTION

Le diabète est la première cause de neuropathie périphérique (NP) dans le monde.¹ Aux États-Unis, les coûts annuels directs des NP diabétiques sont plus élevés que le traitement des cancers les plus fréquents. La prévalence du diabète de type 2 croît rapidement parallèlement à l'augmentation du nombre de personnes obèses. Le diabète affectant environ 246 millions de personnes dans le monde (International Diabetes Federation, www.idf.org), on peut estimer à 20 à 30 millions le nombre de sujets souffrant d'une NP diabétique. L'incidence des NP est plus difficile à estimer, certainement sous-évaluée car les signes de début sont parfois difficiles à mettre en évidence et la plupart des patients suivis en diabétologie ne font pas l'objet d'examen répétés. Des différentes analyses multivariées, on peut retenir, comme principaux facteurs indépendants prédictifs de NP diabétique, un âge avancé au moment du diagnostic, des taux élevés d'hyperglycémie chronique, la durée du diabète et l'utilisation de l'insuline qui témoignent de la présence d'une certaine insulinopénie.²

Cet article discute des tableaux cliniques des NP du diabète : il est organisé en trois parties, avec rappel des formes cliniques fréquentes et rares, la description des examens complémentaires, la physiopathologie et les traitements disponibles. Le diagnostic précoce est recommandé par l'Association américaine pour le diabète, qui propose l'éducation des patients à l'auto-surveillance des pieds pour la prévention de complications podologiques.³ Le médecin traitant joue le rôle pivot dans la prise en charge et le dépistage des NP, conformément à plusieurs consensus, des investigations neurologiques sont proposées uniquement face à une NP inhabituelle.³ Le dépistage clinique est simple mais indispensable et doit être effectué au moins une fois par an chez le patient à bas risque et à chaque consultation pour le patient à haut risque. Le patient à risque étant défini par une pallesthésie < 4/8, des callosités ou des antécédents de mal perforant. L'âge et des conditions psychosociales défavorables sont aussi des facteurs de risque significatifs. La NP diabétique diminue significativement la qualité de vie des patients.
