Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems in a community sample of young adults and to examine the association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use.

Methods: Data were obtained from the 2001 National Alcohol Survey, a national survey of young adults (ages 18–24) in the United States. The survey included questions about self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 12.5%. The prevalence of self-reported substance use was 15.5%. The association between self-reported mental health problems and self-reported substance use was positive and significant.

Conclusions: The results of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are associated with self-reported substance use in young adults.

Keywords: Mental health problems, Substance use, Young adults
