Abstract

Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported mental health problems among a sample of young adults in the United States. The study also examined the association between self-reported mental health problems and demographic factors, including age, gender, and education level.

Methods: A cross-sectional survey was conducted using a nationally representative sample of young adults (ages 18-29) in the United States. The survey included a validated self-report measure of mental health problems, the Brief Symptom Inventory (BSI-53). Demographic information was collected through a series of questions.

Results: The prevalence of self-reported mental health problems was 12.5% among the sample. The prevalence was significantly higher among females (15.2%) than males (7.8%). The prevalence was also significantly higher among those with a high school or less education (14.1%) than those with a college degree or higher (8.9%).

Conclusions: The findings of this study suggest that self-reported mental health problems are more prevalent among females and those with a high school or less education. These findings have implications for the development of targeted mental health interventions and policies.
