

The Monetary Equation of Exchange

Economists use an equation made famous by Irving Fisher to show the relationship among money, price and real output. This equation is called the equation of exchange, and it typically takes the following form:

$$MV = PQ$$

M = the amount of money in circulation

V = the income velocity of money

P = the average price level

Q = real GDP or real value of all final goods and services

This equation attempts to show the balance between “money,” which is represented on the left side of the equation, and goods and services, which are represented on the right side. For a given level of income velocity, if the supply of money grows faster than the rate of real output (changes in Q), then there will be inflation in the economy. Classical economists assumed that the velocity of money was stable (constant) over time because institutional factors — such as how frequently people are paid — largely determine velocity.
