

arguments are the most important. ¹⁶ Positive damages are primarily analyzed in their potential to ameliorate problems which are caused by the fact that tort law and tort damages in reality do not function as assumed in the simple model described in section 2.1.

The fact that punishment is regarded as a goal of the private law instrument of damages introduces the question whether this form of private enforcement is an alternative for public enforcement (again, one of the topics from the call for papers). There is a rich Law and Economics literature on the question under which circumstances private enforcement is better and when public enforcement is to be preferred.¹⁷ A discussion of that literature lies beyond the scope of this paper, but a few remarks are in place.

As I have already mentioned in section 2.2, both criminal law and tort law serve the goal of deterrence. Given that tort law has lower systemic costs than criminal law (due to the latter's procedural safeguards, high social costs of its sanctions or, conversely, criminal law is regarded as an efficient mechanism which should only be utilized if tort law cannot adequately deter wrongful behaviour). A first reason why this could be the case, is the fact that not all wrongdoers will face liability in all cases (also see section 3.2 below), as this is an economic reason for imposing positive damages). The expected liability therefore is too low to provide the correct incentives. Criminal sanctions may ameliorate this problem. Second, the injurer may have too few assets to pay the full damages, so that the financial incentives from tort law do not fully reach him. Non-financial sanctions from criminal law could then be regarded as providing adequate behavioural incentives. The fact that criminal sanctions may mitigate the potential wrongdoer adds to the deterrent function of criminal sanctions. Finally, there are several reasons why a victim may not start a lawsuit against the wrongdoer (also see section 3.2 below): Criminal law, with the action being brought by the public prosecutor rather than the victim, can overcome this problem.

Positive damages may be able to solve some of the aforementioned problems, without shifting from private law to public law. The economic arguments for positive damages,
