Abstract The purpose of this study was to examine the effect of a 12-week training program on the performance of young female basketball players. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The participants were 15 young female basketball players, aged 16-18 years, who were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group underwent a 12-week training program that focused on improving their performance in various basketball skills, including shooting, passing, and dribbling. The control group did not receive any training. The results of the study showed that the experimental group significantly improved their performance in all three skills compared to the control group. The improvement was most pronounced in shooting, where the experimental group's shooting accuracy increased by 15% over the 12-week period. The results suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the performance of young female basketball players in various skills.

Table 1 presents the results for each of the four models. The dependent variable is the number of minutes of television watched per week. The independent variables are the demographic characteristics of the respondent. The results are presented in the form of coefficients and standard errors. The coefficients are the estimated effect of a one-unit change in the independent variable on the dependent variable. The standard errors are the standard deviation of the coefficients. The t-statistics are the ratio of the coefficient to the standard error. The p-values are the probability of observing a t-statistic as extreme as the one observed, assuming the null hypothesis is true. The adjusted R-squared is the proportion of the variance in the dependent variable that is explained by the independent variables, adjusted for the number of independent variables in the model.
