

THE SCIENCE OF THE MIND
LESSON 10
Stress and Emotions

Stressors from both the outside (or physical) and inside (or biological) worlds are not equivalent for everybody. Each individual has a unique response to stressors and a unique set of biological and psychological responses.

In general, emotional responses are usually an early stressor that triggers a response in preparing for a stimulus. Often the response is automatic and occurs without much thought.

In 1926, Walter Dill Floyd and James M. Davis were the first to show that stressors are processed differently by different people. They conducted an experiment in 1926 that showed that some people were more stressed out than others. They found that some people were more stressed out than others. They found that some people were more stressed out than others. They found that some people were more stressed out than others.

All participants showed a similar level of stress. The test showed that people were more stressed out than others. The test showed that people were more stressed out than others. The test showed that people were more stressed out than others. The test showed that people were more stressed out than others.
