	Exponential Growth	An organism is introduced into a homogeneous environment containing small food resources
	Phase II	Resource limited growth
	Phase III	Self-regulating of the population is reached

Lesson Summary

Describing Populations

Ecological Systems have an ecological study population. Ecologists study a particular community, often geographic range, growth rate, density, and distribution, and the environment.

Change after Change They give us a population size study of geographic range, of population density, and of population growth. For example, the population of humans is a study of change. A population of animals is a study of change. A population of plants is a study of change. A population of birds is a study of change. A population of fish is a study of change. A population of insects is a study of change. A population of bacteria is a study of change. A population of viruses is a study of change. A population of fungi is a study of change. A population of protists is a study of change. A population of eukaryotes is a study of change. A population of prokaryotes is a study of change. A population of organisms is a study of change. A population of life is a study of change. A population of the universe is a study of change.

Growth Rate The number of organisms in a population can change over time, as it grows and dies. Population growth can occur rapidly under certain conditions, such as, birth rate, death rate, and the relationship of birth rate and death rate.
