Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of risk factors between two groups of adolescents who had been sexually abused and those who had not. A total of 106 adolescents participated in the study. Results showed that there were no significant differences between the two groups in terms of demographic variables or risk factors. However, there were significant differences in the prevalence of certain risk factors between the two groups. Specifically, the prevalence of physical abuse, sexual abuse, and emotional abuse was significantly higher in the group of adolescents who had been sexually abused than in the group of adolescents who had not. These findings suggest that the experience of sexual abuse may be associated with a higher prevalence of certain risk factors.
