✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Man-made disasters are occurrences that come about due to man's activities on the earth's surface. They can be intentional or accidental, but in either case, they can cause great harm to human beings, animals, property and the environment at large. Some examples of man-made disasters include global warming which has been caused by excessive burning of fossils and deforestation or land cultivation this exposing the settlements to landslides, soil erosion, and desertification. Some disasters caused by man intentionally include terrorism and war (Schein 2006).

On the other hand, natural disasters occur naturally and can cause severe losses to humans, directly or indirectly, and also environmental destruction. Some of these include earthquakes, floods, tsunamis, eruptions, and hurricanes. For example, the Spanish flu of 1918-1919, that killed millions of people even more than the First World War which was before it (James, 1996). Effects of such disasters can be very devastating since they occur naturally without man's prior knowledge hence the need to be prepared through prior planning.

Other disasters can be classified as both man-made and natural since they occur due to a combination of the two factors. For example, mine collapse can be said to occur naturally due to earth's shifts and at the same can be man-made due to poor construction of mines by man.

Whether natural or man-made, the effects of such disasters can be very devastating to mankind, either physically or psychologically. The reactions of people at the individual and community level may also differ in either case. A natural disaster model proposed by Chapman 1962 (as cited in James, 1996, p. 102) reveals that there are stages that follow before a disaster occurs. Before a natural disaster strikes, there is the 'warning stage' where warnings may be sent to people, though some may ignore or probably may not get the information. By the time it gets to 'threat stage', signs of an impending danger begin to be felt, although in this case, some disasters have little or no prior warning. When a disaster finally strikes – 'impact stage', there is a lot of anxiety amongst people close to it or those who had a prior experience of a similar occurrence.
