Anatole France,2015-12-31 CHAPTER I Monsieur Bergeret was seated at table taking his frugal evening meal Riquet lay at his feet on a tapestry cushion Riquet had a religious soul he rendered divine honours to mankind He regarded his master as very good and very great But it was chiefly when he saw him at table that he realized the sovereign greatness and goodness of Monsieur Bergeret If to Riquet all things pertaining to food were precious and impressive those pertaining to the food of man were sacred He venerated the dining room as a temple the table as an altar During meals he kept his place at his master s feet in silence and immobility It s a spring chicken said old Ang lique as she placed the dish upon the table Good Be kind enough to carve it then said Monsieur Bergeret who was a poor hand with weapons and quite hopeless as a carver Willingly said Ang lique but carving isn t woman s work it s the gentlemen who ought to carve poultry I don t know how to carve Monsieur ought to know This dialogue was by no means new Ang lique and her master exchanged similar remarks every time that game or poultry came to the table It was not flippantly it was certainly not to save herself trouble that the old servant

persisted in offering her master the carving knife as a token of the respect which was due to him In the peasant class from which she had sprung and also in the little middle class households where she had been in service it was a tradition that it was the master's duty to carve The faithful old soul's respect for tradition was profound She did not think it right that Monsieur Bergeret should fall short of it that he should delegate to her the performance of so authoritative a function that he should fail to carve at his own table since he was not grand enough to employ a butler to do it for him like the Br c s the Bonmonts and other such folk in town or country She knew the obligations which honour imposes on a citizen who dines at home and she never failed to impress them upon Monsieur Bergeret
