Living versus Nonliving

Defining "Life" is not an easy task. Consider the great diversity of living things; from E. coli bacteria to protists (like an amoeba), to fungal slime molds, giant redwood trees and humans. All of these diverse living things are considered "alive", but what properties and processes do they all share? What structures and functions are unique to life? What "unifies" these organisms?

In this activity you will compare and contrast living things and nonliving things.

Task

Along the top of Table 1 are all the characteristics shared by all living things – All living things possess All of these characteristics. A nonliving thing may possess some of these characteristics, but not all of them.

Select each specimen provided by your teacher, and write its name in the first column. In your group, discuss and decide whether it possesses each of the Characteristics of Life. Record your answers as "Yes", "No" or "CD" (cannot determine). Decide as to whether each specimen is a Living or Nonliving thing and record "Yes", "No" or "CD" in the last column.
