

Chapter 10: Developing New Products and Services

Services: intangible activities or benefits that an organization provides to satisfy consumers' needs in exchange for money or value.

Idea: thought that leads to a product or action, like a concept

Consumer products: products purchased by the ultimate consumer

Business products: products purchased by the organization to assist in providing other products for resale.

Types of Consumer Products:

- Convenience: items that the consumer purchases frequently, conveniently, and with a minimum shopping effort
- Shopping: items the consumer compares several alternatives on criteria such as price, quality, or style
- Specialty: makes a special effort to search out and buy
- Unsought: does not know about or knows about but does not initially want

Derived demand: sales of business products frequently result from the sale of consumer products

Components: items that become part of the final product.

Support products assist in producing other products and services. Include installations, accessory equipment, supplies, and industrial services

Classifying services: delivered by people or equipment, business firms or nonprofits, or government agencies

- Product class: industry to which they belong (iPad is a tablet device)
- Product item: specific product that has a unique brand, size, or price
- Product line: a group of product or service items that are closely related because they satisfy a class of needs, are used together, are sold to the same customer group, are distributed through the same outlets, or fall within a given price range.
- Product mix: which consists of all the product lines offered by an organization.

Feature bloat- too many complexities and options, even though consumers say that they want more options, they do not.

New Products and Why They Succeed or Fail

- New products may be functionally different from existing ones, but still considered new.
- Continuous innovation: consumers don't learn new behaviors
- Dynamically continuous innovation: only minor changes in behavior are required
